Senate only, that body could accomplish nothing, pass no measure and It is known that he proposed to take down the bloody shirt, to subdue the bitter memories of the war, and to give the Southern people once more some voice in the conduct of federal affairs. He proposed to present an administration of which the chief characteristics should be reconciliation and peace. He proposed once moré to take the South into his confidence, and to consult the people of substance and good sense, and character in the South as to the officers he should appoint and the measures he should recommend. In short if only the Southern people would not spit in his face, to set them once more on their feet.

Gen. Mahone had the odd vote in the Senate, and on him would devolve the great responsibility of making a break in the Bourbon-Funder policy of hate and antagonism toward the North. Should the Confederate war be revived on paper and continued at a time when the North was sending us a flag of truce by the hand of Garfield?
